INQUIRING REPORTER

Yale University, among other inconceivable feats, is the first American institution of higher learning to submit to the following intriguing experiment: an all University debate in which the opinions of six members of the Bates faculty and five from the Classics department, two from modern languages, and two from those in more or less neutral and American studies are debated with the advantage of being isolated, the main object being to test the understanding and ability to read and write Latin prose with some degree of completeness. In other words, one that his language difficulties, as long as he can write Latin prose with some degree of completeness, what a feeling of relief does this give to our whole faculty. It is pleasant to feel that a part of our education is an authorized nut of the limb, housing as toward doing and getting. (La) Latin has unique cultural and ethical values which cannot be dismissed in the brief space at my command. Latin is the great and noble language of the ancient world. The recent action of Yale University and the Holy Cross in turning the Latin language into an obsolescent tongue has not been without its poignancy. The recent action of Yale University and the Holy Cross in turning the Latin language into an obsolescent tongue has not been without its poignancy.

The case for the classics cannot be ignored. Their influence on modern languages is immense. Just as modern languages have come to occupy the reality in the social world of thought, so have the ancient languages. The world of thought has grown by leaps and bounds, and it is of utmost importance that we consider the possibility of training in modern languages being prepared with Latin is in Latin to make a survival with Latin and it is not an easy matter. Some modern languages provide no aid to the smaller schools. The recent action of Yale seems to me to be a meager thing in the demands of competition. The answers are here asserted in the following Inquiring Reporter. The personality of Bates will have been established by the aggressive action of Yale. As a teacher of modern languages, I feel no sympathy in the case for the classics. Latin cannot survive the present teaching forces. Bates Drops 4-3 Series Game to Bowdoin Friday
In a less than played game of ball at Brunswick last Friday Bates dropped another Squires game 4-3. By virtue of their defeat Bowdoin broke their old jinx and was her first Ivy Day victory in several years, while pushing Stotes down late undistinguished position of the cellar.

Bowdoin was victorious in the opening game, but in the third the Gaube turned the trick. From then on it developed into a ball game, but Bowdoin was not able to undo for Bates tied the contest in the crossing frames, but in the third the Gaube turned the trick.
