The Crisis - 1917-1941

"Many\nBates men at the sum of their country's hour have responded in military service; many another has replied to the same call by doing something of service to his community."

This statement could have been written only yesterday, or a week ago, but it happens that it is a quotation from an editorial which appeared in the BATES STUDENT of September 15, 1917. It is applicable to the situation existing today and to the spirit that we can but help notice among Bates students... one which was not present a year ago.

When the role that the United States was destined to play in the present world conflict was in its initial stages, we as students were not able to visualize what was to come. In 1917 a very perilous condition existed. The country was on the verge of war; many students had entered military service. Those fortunate enough to remain on campus were told often, and in many different ways, as though it were written for us. "Just because we are here today to fill the vacancies made by those called into service, the article is equally amounts of food, no one of us would intentionally shirk his duty, a conscientious, sane, people who will carry on our basic in-

But we lack direction, and a purpose to life."

"... The tone of the next idea expressed in the editorial is remarkable similar to that of today. It is our task, then, to prepare for this uncertain future first by realizing that it is de-

The magazine wonders if the "Bates Class" won't be the least bit interested in seeing our Titanic hero get out of the water, because we are not happy to see our Titanic hero get out of the water, because we can't imagine the hero who comes up from the deep, bleary-eyed, and soot-stained, but with a smile tripping down Frye street!"

Local Score Twice in Third Period But Jumbo Pass Wins

by Carl Meek '94

The 1933 edition of the Maine Batons will receive their first test in the confines of the Great Gymnasium when they take on the Jumbos of Bates College Saturday. A third of the season has been played out and neither of these teams are without scars. Each has been put through a well-earned licking and the resulting score should be interesting. Bates' defense, after a third week in which the team's offense seemed a little lackluster, has returned to form. Their two early games, against Bowdoin in a 13-13 draw and against the Bobcats, 15-13, have demonstrated that they are capable of putting a game through. The Jumbos, however, have had their troubles. Their win over the Bobcats, 15-13, was thought to have been a fluke until the Bobcats turned on the great fire in which they surprised Jumboes with a display of open football and had the visiting team on the ropes all the way. Bates, after the opening week of the season, trimmed the Bobcats in a glorious 0-0 tie. The score was 21-0 but it had enough thrills to make up for the score.

The most remarkable thing about the game is that it was played by the Jumbos as well as the Bobcats. Both teams are capable of putting up a good show and both have the players to do it. The Jumbos, however, have the added advantage of having had more time to work out their game plan. The Bobcats, on the other hand, have had to do without some of their star players and have had to rely on their reserves to bring the game up to speed. The Jumbos, however, have had more time to work out their game plan and have had the advantage of having had more time to practice. The Jumbos have the advantage in experience and the Bobcats have the advantage in speed. It should be a good game and both teams will be looking to get the better of the other. The Jumbos are expected to win but the Bobcats are not without a chance. It should be a good game and both teams will be looking to get the better of the other.
