The Middle Men...

In economic theory and practice, the middle men are the profit makers. Contrary to this fundamental concept, however, a conservative group in most college administration and faculty, a conservative group in most college administration and faculty, is the difficulty in regard to freshman rules.

The Problem...

The smoke with ruling and club reorganization were rather tough nuts to crack, and although the decisions may not right now be entirely satisfactory to all concerned, it is believed time will prove their worth. Now, however, with the war and all of its ramifications, come real headaches, not only for the administration but also for the council.

The Point...

The Point.

This editorial makes no attempt to evaluate the respective viewpoints of the administration and the student body. It is, on the other hand, written to point out the difficulty in which such a situation places the Council. The administration says that it doesn't do to the college any good to dress college men to look foolish in these serious times, that there are better ways to enforce the regulations. The student says that there is a point in which they are entitled to exercise their own judgment.

Appreciation...

The viewpoint is not entirely justifiable, for after the students here now go on to whatever lies ahead, the college has to stand on record these students make in times such as these. The faculty and administration are very definitely pursuing a well-planned and long range view, one to the college's best interest. Naturally, cautious and conservative policy must be followed until the mist of clouds of doubt parts to have the way for quick, sure, and progressive action. It is important for the men here now to realize this.

The faculty, however, to appreciate the standpoint of these students, the professor of whom do not really believe they may live many years longer. The sophomores remember their haircuts, therefore, they resent what they call the weak-kneed action of the thirteen certain seniors and juniors agree with them. Moreover, they feel some relaxation is needed, and they believe putting freshmen in their place with stringent enforcement of fresh rules, with haircuts and humiliating pasties is not only right but also entertaining.
